June 2010 update from Ken Millwood

Dear All,

Here I am with my latest update, although only just technically squeezing into June.

I have spent a small amount of time on the book in the past few months. One Sunday while driving home from church I had the thought that if dependence on God had a theme song, what would it be? – and the obvious answer was a re-write of the song make famous by Frank Sinatra (you know the one) so it became, "I did it God's Way." This led me to typing up a few hundred words in the afternoon on the chapter dealing with doing things our own way independent of God.

During the week I was away with work at the Christian Resource Exhibition (CRE) I reached the decision I should self-publish the book. My main reason being I can then say what I want to say (with the themes that originally inspired me to start it), and not what a publisher wants me to say (which might be more commercially driven).

So with the two committees I still do Secretarial work for, Open Air outreach in Bristol, Signpost puppets and full time work, at times my life seems like a To-Do-List where I complete the next item, tick it off the list and then add two more items to the bottom of the list. I even made the conscious decision to not watch as much of the World Cup football as I normally would to free up some time. I do sense that things are about to change so I will have more time and space to work on the book, but can't say more as yet.

The total word count is therefore still around 34,000 and the next update will be in September.

Kind Regards,

Ken
